A longtime friend of President Donald Trump's who once said he hoped to be his attorney general is being considered for a federal judgeship, The Washington Post reported on Wednesday. A White House source told the Post that the president is considering Leonard Leo, the president and CEO of the Federalist Society, a conservative legal advocacy group for Supreme Court nominees. Leo is credited with helping the administration shape a list of 20 candidates for the Supreme Court. He made that list last June after a gauntlet of interviews. Leo, who is the president and CEO of the Federalist Society, was once a friend of Donald Trump's. NBC News According to the Federalist Society's website, Leo led the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel during the George W. Bush administration. The White House says Leo is not a potential nominee. Let our news meet your inbox. The news and stories that matters, delivered weekday mornings. Leo has also been described as one of the president's closest confidants. Leo has called Trump "a very effective president." Leo was once described as Trump's "closest legal mind," a potential running mate or possible attorney general — a view he apparently has kept. At a private fundraiser for a Republican congresswoman, Leo recalled a trip he took to Trump Tower in New York City with the future president. "We didn't have a single thought — and how he ran for president, how he became the front-runner and won," Leo told the donor, according to the Post. "So we met him at the office and he
